Argrenath - The Sanguine Hearth

Pronounced: arr-gruh-nath; Adj. Grent

Capital	Crimson
Races	Dwarves, Goliaths, subterranean races
Political	The Red Barons
Commerce	Metalworks, Mining, Labor
Deities	Cochineal, Kermes, Kerr Lacca

Summary: It is a country of hard-working, battle-hardened people. It specializes in industry, particularly metalworking, and is very strict on the laws and governance. Visitors must even proceed through various customs to get in and out of the country. They pride themselves on being self-sufficient, however due to the country's extreme climate and heavy refining, resources have become limited.

Culture: The people of Argrenath are hard-working and close-knit. They don't welcome those who would lie, steal, or devalue good craft. Honor is everything in Argrenath, and the highest crime one can commit is theft. Most offenders are usually thrown in The Rust, but some might just settle disputes with an ax through the skull. As per the teachings of Madder, family is of utmost importance to Grents. Though the clans are originally dwarvish, they've extended to many other races as time has gone on. Some clan heads have even been non-dwarfs.

Government: Dwarven clans in Argrenath each specialize in a specific trade. The houses are not only responsible for parts of the commerce and production, but also elect head families to represent functions of government. These heads, called Barons, all meet in the capital to negotiate proceedings and the values of goods and services. There are 10 in all, each with a large stake in how their hold is shared among others. This is important since Grents don't deal in currency, but offer bartering and favors from their clans. A favor from a Baron's clan can be worth its weight in gold.

Organizations: The Firesteel Ironworks and Mantle Mining, headed by the Firesmith and Mantlestone clans respectively, are the most influential groups in the country. The Garnet Guard is a huge extended family of warriors who protect the country.

Environment: The land is hot, rocky, and arid due to volcanic activity. Some hardier creatures have grown accustomed to the hotter climate, such as the steelshell turtles. Much of the ground is solid and rocky like hardened magma, making it difficult to build or farm on. For this reason, the people of Argrenath built their cities primarily underground, and have raised various subterranean creatures for resources. Most notable are warthogs and giant moles. The surface is mostly used for smaller encampments and larger transports.

Major Settlements:

- Amaranth: A homelier city and the center of trade in Argrenath. Several large bazaars are set up for trade of goods and services across the country. There's also many who come here to start up their own businesses. Many prospecting workers and artisans will flock here hoping to be scouted by one of the Barons.

- Burgundy: The only major city that is actually above ground. The runoff produced from the Carmine Rivers is high in minerals needed to sustain most wildlife, and as such it has been made the head of agriculture in Argrenath.
- Cardinal: The courier of Argrenath. It's an outpost beyond the Cordovan mostly used to keep records of visitors. It also has temporary housing for the dwarven guards and visitors. It is above ground and sports several entry tunnels through the Blush Mountains. The teleportation circle is under heavy restrictions, and will not allow anyone in or out without a visa.
- Cordovan: Part of an impenetrable stone wall that spans across the northern border of Argrenath, this massive bastion stands as a checkpoint and the only means of entry or exit into the country by land. The Garnet Guard is headquartered here, ready to mobilize should war ever break out.
- Crimson: The capital of Argrenath, it lies deep inside Mt. Cinnabar. It is the steelworking hot spot, using the intense pressure produced by the volcano to create extra-hardened metals such as adamantine. Once a month, barons from across the country come to discuss trade and national issues at the House of Barons.
- Maroon: A port town situated inside of an open cavern in the southern peninsula. It serves as the center for fishing as well as a checkpoint for vessels. The lack of boating material in Argrenath has prevented them from exporting goods, so instead they rely on what they call crag-fishing. Some families have also been working on developing boats from other materials here.
- Sangria: A place for rough and rowdy drinkers. A popular locale for those looking for entertainment or a place to rest. It is also the only direct way of getting to Crimson. Sangria has a unique love for adventurers and offers fun and food to anyone willing to do an odd or dangerous job.

Other Places:

- Blush Mountains: A mountain range surrounding the east border. A large quantity of precious ores are in the mountains, and as such large tunnel systems snake throughout the entire range. As time went by, several towns and cities were developed within these mountains. The higher peaks are home to many Goliath settlements.
- Carmine Rivers: If Mt. Cinnabar is considered the heart of Argrenath, then Carmine Rivers would be its veins. Carrying nutrient-rich runoff from the volcanic waste, it is a veritable oasis from the otherwise infertile rocklands of the country.
- Mt. Cinnabar: The heart of Argrenath. It's a large and mostly inactive volcano in the northwest of the country. The heat and pressure it produces makes it excellent for ironworking, and several forges were set up within it. It's because of this, and its natural defenses from invasion, that it became the location of Argrenath's capital.
- The Rust: An inescapable prison hosting dangerous criminals. Most who end up here spend the rest of their lives doing hard labor for the country. Since Blush Mountains hosts a wealth of precious ores, Mantle Mining has a facility situated here using the prisoners for labor.

Cirranbar – The Scorched Dunelands

Pronounced: Sear-anne-bar; Adj. Cirr or Cirran

Capital	Oriole
Races	Orcs, Tabaxi, wild races
Political	None
Commerce	None
Deities	Saffron, Gamboge

Summary: Freelands and frontiers. The lands were long disputed by both Argrenath and Flavo Topis. After a ceasefire, it was agreed to be an intermittent territory. Considered lawless and savage wilds by many. Several bandits and raiders have made this country their homes, and the flora and fauna are twice as vicious. One misstep can be the end of even the toughest of adventurers.

Culture: After years of battle and strife staining the land, most inhabitants have turned against civilization and ruling leaders. The desert lands are harsh and take no survivors; those who live here have hardened their bodies and their hearts. People have adapted to more nomadic lifestyles as settlements tend not to last long in the waving dunes. There are also those who have a sense of adventure in their hearts, and travel the lands in search of a promised land.

Government: The closest thing to a ruling force here are the bandit gangs and rebel groups who take lands by force.

Environment: The land is a long dry desert with sweeping sandstorms. Parts to the north bordering the Coral Peaks have had more flourishing climates, even able to host crops. Despite the arid climate, large and hardy creatures have managed to sustain themselves, including dinosaurs.

Settlements:

- Apricot: A lively land of farmers and mercenaries who dedicate themselves to living life off of their own earnings, completely isolated from international affairs. The people here are extremely wary of outsiders, and only loose contact from small settlements like Moccasin have made any contact.
- Ochre: A host of scoundrels and ruled by bandits. It's ill-advised to enter this area without a hardy entourage. The Dune King, leader of the Ochre Bandits, has made his residence here.
- Oriole (Oar-ee-ohl): A courier jointly governed by Argrenath and Flavo Topis. It's more or less a post for militaries of both parties. It hosts the only functional teleporter for the three countries.

Other Places:

- Coral Peaks: A large mountain range to the north that separates the country from the Feldgrau Forest. Various bandits are said to reside in this area.
- Persimmon Ruins (Purr-sih-mahn): A collection of old temples left behind by the old ruler Persimmon, the Rune King. There are said to be labyrinthine catacombs beneath with ancient secrets.
- Sunset Valley: Many come in search of a promised land, but none have succeeded and come back to tell the tale. It's rumored to be the center of a great paradise where Saffron resides.

Flavo Topis – The Sun-Touched Kingdom

Pronounced: Flahv-oh Toh-pis; Adj. Flav or Flavic

Capital	Marigold
Races	Humans, halflings
Political	King Xanther dul Flavo XIV
Commerce	Crops, Produce, Tourism
Deities	Fustic, Quercitron, Myrabalan

Summary: A picturesque and sunny country; Flavo Topis is home to many tourist spots within Akroma. The country prides itself in its bountiful farmlands, rolling green hills, and shimmering beaches. The people are humble, earnest, and jovial. They love and welcome people like neighbors, and have a friendly disposition.

Culture: Raised on the laurels of Weld, the people here are pleasant and pious. The Flavs are much more forward about their beliefs, which in the past spurred crusades. After the peace treaty with Argrenath, the current King had decided to settle down the tempers of the people. They are however quite quaint in their views, shying away from the arcane and mechanical advancements of other countries. A life here can be peaceful, if a bit mundane.

Government: A ceremony of succession in the name of Fustic is held to name the new King. It is by his holy authority that the will of Weld be done. The king's rule is absolute, and to question him is to question the gods themselves. The king also has direct authority over the Aurum Gauntlet and the most trusted become part of the Knights of Sun, his loyal protectors. The king as of recent has directed most of his efforts towards making Flavo Topis a tourist paradise as a show of good faith and to help with reparations after the war.

Organizations: The Aurum Gauntlet is a large order of paladins headquartered in Aureolin. They seek to purge the world of all monsters and bring an era of prosperity for the Flavs. Many were crusaders during the Blazing Sun War. There's also the council of Fustic; advisers of the king and the prophets who help decide new ordinances and, when the time comes, rulers.

Environment: The land is much more temperate than the other southern countries. Flavo Topis enjoys the privilege of a vastly diverse ecosystem of vibrant flora and gentle fauna. It's because of this that the area has been such a popular tourism area. It is mostly plains and hills. A lot of the area has been converted to farms and towns, with a few forests spared for their prestige, like the wild Jean-Quille Orchard which hosts golden-leaf trees during harvest season.

Settlements:

- Aureolin (Oar-ee-oh-linne): A garrison for the Aurum Gauntlet. Those who seek to become champions of the gods typically enlist themselves here. They're also the country's major producer of silver.
- Begonia: The floral crest of Flavo Topis. The city is more for a large garden host to many interesting plants and animals. The royal family tend to spend long vacations here.
- Calamansi: A gourmand city. It has a heated rivalry of two cooking families on which flavor was better: sweet or savory. It split the city in two, and has since created a lively competition every harvest year called the Calabash at the center of Lake Limon.

- Canary: A courier town. Since travel is so important to the Flavs, this town is constantly bustling with activity. There are fancy ships here that go across the Flavesce Bay to Begonia.
- Flaxen: Known as the town of new beginnings, ex-convicts, retired soldiers, and those down on their luck come here to cleanse their souls of sin and start anew. Despite what most would assume, it is a diligent and quiet town.
- Maize: The major farming city. The land is especially fertile, to which they thank Quercitron. being a major export of food, and at the center of Flavo Topis, they've also become a center of transportation within the country.
- Marigold: A beautiful city surrounding Castle Fulvos. In wanting to make this city as beautiful as possible, the king has enlisted several famous artists and cultural savants to live here. It's mostly known as the city of Renaissance, and to be accepted here is one of the highest honors.
- Moccasin: A town that was once a part of Cirranbar. Despite the truce between nations, the land is still considered claimed by the Flavs. Due to being so far from the kingdom, they haven't been given the same luxury treatment as other major towns, and have had to rely on Apricot for help.

Other Places:

- Buff Bay: A gorgeous bay where most come to cruise. It's also heavily defended by Flav ocean liners. The beaches are considered one of the most beautiful places in Akroma.
- Chartreuse Mire: A muggy swamp that goes along the border between Flavo Topis and Cirranbar. In the Flav's first attempts to expand westward, they settled the lands claimed from the latter. Witches however are said to have cursed the land for their hubris, turning the land into a dangerous bog.
- Jean-Quille Orchard (John-Kweel): A massive orchard in the eastern part of Flavo Topis. It was started by the man Jean-Quille long ago who wanted to create food for his people. He was said to be blessed by Weld, and reigned as the king of Flavo Topis after his deeds.
- Lake Limon (Lee-mohn): A large lake near Calamansi. It's where the Calabash is held, a grand event where chefs of the city compete to see who can make the best food in the country. Connoisseurs from all over the continent come to test dishes.

Maradosa – The Verdant Glades

Pronounced: Mare-uh-doh-suh; Adj. Maradosan

Capital	Shamrock
Races	Gnomes & Halflings; Elves and fey (Feldgrau)
Political	Mint Moguls
Commerce	Coin, forestry, magitek
Deities	Broom; Verdigris

Summary: A guild empire; affluent and profiteering. They hold a monopoly on the buying and selling of commonly-produced magical wares. There is also a large forest in the west that is known to host several druid circles and other tribes.

Culture: Because of the inhabitants being mostly halflings and gnomes, Maradosa has been defined by a very eccentric and colorful lifestyle. The people are always looking for something new and big, and many try their hands at making the next big thing. The guilds like to see themselves as free-thinking opportunists, though some would simply call them money-grubbing. The west however is said to be filled with troublesome folk who attack nearby villages.

Government: The metropolis of Maradosa is basically one giant conglomerate. Each of the guilds can put a number of stock and equity into the country to gain influence and land. Those in the upper echelons are known as Mint Moguls. Guilds hold several proceedings to determine stock and trade values. The Feldgrau Forest however is beyond their influence. Rather, it is ungoverned but watched over by many druidic circles, each called a Branch of the Great Oak. The Olive Branch are the most amicable and made open paths for trusted caravans throughout the forest.

Organizations: The Citrine Eye is the headquarters of the guilds and where stock and values are watched heavily. There is a conglomerate of other guilds dispersed around Maradosa that control major functions. Other major guilds include the Crocco Gang who handle “protection” in Peridot, the Jade Sails who handle sailing in Mindaro, and Teal Steelworks which facilitates a lot of the inventions in Malach Heights. There’s also the Celadon Cards, who runs the casinos in Harlequin and received a recent boom in influence.

Environment: The area to the north is much more verdant and vibrant, with a vast forest taking up much of the country. The Feldgrau Forest is vast with untamed life, while the east has many windy grasslands and a veritable metropolis. There is a heavy fey influence allowing sprawling flora and odd fauna even within the more industrious east.

Settlements: .

- Harlequin: Bordering Methysto has influenced this city quite a bit. It’s themed towards flashy spectacles, heavy gambling, and drinking. Several casinos and tourist traps have been set up for the less savvy spenders.
- Kakapo (Caw-kuh-poh): The courier city. The city keeps records of guild activity and international shipments. The biggest collection of pencil pushers there ever was. Documentation is a major trade here, and it’s where all paperwork is processed.

- Laurel (Yanny): A druid village deep within the Feldgrau Forest. The Olive Branch of the Great Oak has allowed travellers through this area in for passage to other countries in the north. It stands as the public center for the druids, though some dislike the welcoming of outsiders.
- Malach Heights: A town in the business of invention. There people here are all looking to make the next big thing. A paradise for the creative tinkering types, with steam and machinery as far as the eye can see. They also specialize in fabricating mithril, a light yet durable material great for machinery.
- Mindaro (Min-dahr-oh): On an island in the east. It's focused more on shipping and vessels. They also have an appreciation for the fine arts and are shrewd connoisseurs of worldly historic pieces.
- Peridot: A small village closest to the Feldgrau Forest. It mostly houses some mercenary guilds who can be a bit rough to newcomers. The mercenaries are mainly to deal with Darkspring inhabitants sabotaging foresting guilds
- Shamrock: Home of the Citrine Eye, the HQ in Maradosa. Those looking to make a name for themselves or come here to find a guild or start their own. People watch closely the flow of trade to determine their standings amongst the guilds.

Other Places:

- Feldgrau Forest: A giant forest that takes up most of Maradosa. It's teeming with strange and wild creatures as well as druids. The most central tribes tend to be very secretive and keep to themselves. The other tribes, however, have made efforts in keeping others off their forests.
- Lake Veridian: A large lake near Laurel. The druid circles use the waters for healing and mystic cleansing, and rivers flow from it in all directions. There is a massive oak tree called the Great Oak in the center of the lake that only head druids may visit.
- Sea of Konbu: A sea between Maradosa and Flavo Topis. It's the main method of travel in the west. Mindaro, however, controls most sailing in the area, and depending on the time of season it can get quite expensive.

Covalt – The Boreal Peninsula

Pronounced: Kuh-vault; Adj. Covalti

Capital	Capri Towers
Races	Elves, aquatic races, kobolds; dragonborns (rare)
Political	Cerulean Council
Commerce	Sailing, magic, education
Deities	Anil, Lazuli, Logwood

Summary: A country of magical scholars and sailors. It's freeform in its faculty and law. Most people come here in search of knowledge or to sail the ocean. Their ties with Anil makes them the safest to sail with. Being so close and so curious, they've invested heavily in the secrets of Seppheros, particularly in dragons. This has led to a rather interesting development of draconic creatures that have since spread in popularity among the Covalti.

Culture: The people of Covalt are more bookish and explorative. They are constantly seeking to learn more, particularly about ancient and lost history. The people of Covalt are not swayed by morals and only seek to gain and know more. Their fascination with Seppheros and the arcane has also led them to try and recreate dragons. Though unsuccessful, they ended up creating creatures known as Kobolds, which became a huge trend as adorable little servants across the north.

Government: A group of scholars curious about the mysteries of Akroma created the Capri Towers as a consortium of sorts. Those founding scholars and other like-minded individuals have gained authority through their merits, and overtime pick an apprentice from one of their schools to be the next head. As time went by, they found themselves advising national, and then international issues, and soon became the political heads and representatives of Covalt.

Organizations: The curiosity of magic has driven the funding and authority of Covalt. Each major city has specialized in a school of magic, and a physical school devoted to it, with their own approach to uncovering the truth of Akroma. The headmasters of each school also function as a chair at the Cerulean Council. They mostly discuss political functions and recent discoveries. There are also several bands of pirates who raid the coasts of Covalt and the Brackish Ocean

Environment: Further north than any other country, Covalt is known for its extremely cold climate. In the northern peninsula, it's a snowy tundra. The strait near the islands tends to freeze completely during the winter, making it difficult to traverse from the mainland to Azure Island and the Capri Towers.

Settlements:

- Capri Towers: A citadel where scholars gather to share knowledge and discuss any future endeavors for the magic schools. The schools here are more invested in the new and unlearned aspects of magic, and are obsessed with experimentation.
- Cornflower: Also called the city of bones, Cornflower is much more secluded than the other major cities. Their pursuit is more archaeological, studying bones of old creatures to see how they might have lived. Cornflower uses necromancy for a more "hands-on" approach to the field.

- Jay: The courier town. It's also the major of conjuration magic. They have recently discovered advanced forms of teleportation and have spread the invention to other couriers for better convenience.
- Denim: One of the two port cities of Covalt. Denim handles international travel along The Bleakened Ocean. They specialize in abjuration, and have had their students travel the continent to aid others against magical threats.
- Glaucous: The other port city of Covalt. It's mainly responsible for traveling to and from the mainland. They also specialize in transmutation, and are responsible for the creation of kobolds. They've also developed ways to artificially create draconic humanoids, however the details are a bit drastic.
- Periwinkle: A small gnome village far to the north that specializes in illusion magic. It is surrounded by strange trees called Periwillows. These trees make it impossible to locate the town without a guide.
- Smalt: A small town focused primarily on enchantment. This also includes enchanted items, and is said to have a large collection of magical items both made and discovered.

Other Places:

- Azure Fjord: A frigid flow of water between the island of Azure and mainland Covalt
- Mt. Celeste: The tallest mountain in Akroma, it is also called the Torch's Peak. Its height ensures that the stars are always in view, and as such is chosen as the major of divination magic.
- Zaffre Isles: An archipelago along the Azure Fjord. In order to deal with the rampant issues of pirates and ice floes around the area, they've elected to specialize in evocation magic. The school there is said to be much more chaotic than others.

Methysto – The Midnight Jubilee

Pronounced: Meh-this-toh; Adj. Methystan

Capital	Wisteria
Races	Drow; magical creatures and outsiders
Political	Eminence Iodessa Porphyra
Commerce	Entertainment, Occult oddities
Deities	Murex, Orcein

Summary: A ritzy and aristocratic nation. The people mostly provide entertainment for those up north. They have a love for the exotic, particularly the taboo, and hold grand parties centered around various whatever happens to fancy them at the time. Methysto is a country of endless nights and non-stop partying.

Culture: Methystans absolutely adore anything otherworldly or macabre. They are also very social and habitual party-goers. Though many outside might consider their tastes to be quite immoral, they care more for what's fun. Their lavish lifestyles do have an effect on their ego, and it's not uncommon for people to end up punished for small slights. Methystans find prisons drab and laborious, however, and instead raise those who commit crimes as undead thralls.

Government: Though most nobles are autonomous, they tend to follow certain guidelines to stay in connection with other richer aristocracy. This goes double for any sort of social gatherings or celebrations. It's more of a tacit agreement that those who want to maintain influence keep in favor of others. The reason being that who becomes the Royal Eminence is the one who can maintain favor and interest during the national Orchella Festival. The current Eminence, Iodessa Porphyra, has made quite the show of her influence since she won the last Orchella Festival, and has been a trendsetter in the performing arts.

Environment: Likely due to arcane remnants of the Chromaclasm, the country is in an eternal midnight, with the sun's rays being reflected by a violet aura. This allows the drow and other nocturnal beings to stay active during the day. The high affinity of magic in the area has affected the ecosystem as well, and the wild is full of magical beasts and plants, much to the Methystans' pleasure.

Settlements:

- Fandango: The people of Fandango believe in creating carnivals for the general public. This town was founded by a group of wandering circus performers known as the Fuschia Troupe and moves from time to time.
- Heliotrope: Being so close to the Allium Grove, the people here are quite familiar with the odd beasts and magical creatures. Expect to see some very interesting "pets" going around the streets. The city is littered with iridescent crystals that seem to radiate with intense arcane energy.
- Lavender: Home of the previous Eminence, Petunia, the place has a more mercantile atmosphere. She was much more hedonistic and hoarding, and it reflects in her city of lust and splendor.
- Orchid: A land of picturesque beauty. They're not as loud and rambunctious as the other towns, preferring quiet, thoughtful muses such as art, poetry, and sculpting. Works made there are worth several fortunes.

- Starling: A courier town. Her Eminence has transformed the area into a large opera house and theater where she goes to perform. Singers and actors flock here. They've also taken to making the couriers sing their messages, much to other countries' chagrin.
- Wisteria (Wih-steer-ee-uh): More of a giant palace than a city. This place is reserved for the Eminence and their royal court. They typically invite only the most prestigious of individuals to the area. This is where the Orchella Festival is held, where influential figures can compete with others for social status and a potential seat as the new Eminence.

Other Places:

- Allium Grove: A strange woodland filled with magical crystals. These crystals seem to be highly-concentrated arcane magic, and have had a significant effect on the local fauna and flora. Nearby towns will go hunting for these exotic creatures and bring them to interesting aristocrats.
- Lilac Strait: The large body of water bridging Wisteria with the rest of Methysto. The waters are lit up with party boats and wild magical spectacles.

Other Places & Cultures

Seppheros (Seffe-ur-ohs) - Sepph/Indigonous

The remains of a lost civilization in the north, it is now overrun with the corrupting magic of the Chromaclasm. This distortion has nearly wiped out or warped all life in the area. The only remains are the monsters that roam the lands of Akroma. It's said that descendants of those who survived the Chromaclasm thousands of years ago live in seclusion within the dead country. They are known as the Indigonous for the belief that they are somehow tied to Indigo.

Inyxo (In-nix-oh) - Nyxian

An island far to the west with an active volcano that clouds the sky in ashes. It's said demons and their ilk were once exiled there. It's currently surrounded in black mist and is said to be cursed by Soot. Some inhabitants will occasionally find their way to the mainland. They are typically demonic in appearance, sporting horns and even tails sometimes.

Adamos (Add-uh-mohs) - Adamosan

A country far east in the Bleakish Ocean that has been untouched by the Chromaclasm. It's believed that the angels who fought in the Rebellion came from this country as agents of the Allkrom. It's now home to the Church of the Allkrom, believed to be the architect of the world and its gods. The Church is held in Alabaster, and is led by Archciel Leukas Phthello. Some of the inhabitants, including Phthello, are angelic in appearance with glowing eyes and sometimes silvery marks along their body.

Mudruckers

A long-running movement of people who denounce their nation and creed to roam the world freely. They discard their names and take names and identities related to the color brown, representing the mix of all walks of life. They can be found anywhere, but favor Cirranbar and the Maradosan forests, which are open and free of judgment.

Courier Towns

After the War of the Blazing Sun, it was decided by Covalt that mediation and communication should be established between all countries to hopefully avoid future conflicts. This birthed the courier system. Couriers were Covalti birds magically given the ability to transport messages and small packages over large distances. Each town acted as a conduit for such magic, named after the country's favored bird of choice: Cardinal, Oriole, Canary, Kakapo, Jay, Starling, and Dove. Recent developments in the magic behind couriers also brought the advancement of teleportation circles. However Flavo Topis and Argrenath have heavily restricted teleportation circles within their couriers, due to their experimental nature and the two countries' disdain towards arcane magic. Due to maintenance and security, teleportation between nations is very expensive and typically reserved for noteworthy individuals. There's also strict bans on teleportation outside of registered circles.

The Chromaclasm

Millennia ago, the world of Akroma was very different. There were a myriad of powerful and ancient races and creatures, not least of all were the dragons. They freely roamed the land with their awesome power. However, that all changed when a magical explosion of untold proportions warped the land, destroying the people, their civilization, and the dragons. Not much is known about the cause of such an event, but it has forever changed the world of Akroma, and its terrible corruption influences it to this very day.

Names

- Settlements and other places are typically named explicitly after real colors. The color tends to reflect the nature of the area itself. For example, a dull color for a humble village or a dark color for a shady city.
- People aren't usually so literal about the color scheme when it comes to naming. Usually it can be a derivative for a color (Herb -> Herbert), a color in a different language (Blanche), or something related to a color (Fox).
- Common versus uncommon names simply differ in how "fancy" the words sound or how uncommon the color itself is (Ruby vs Delarouge). Typically, names for the actual common colors (red, orange, yellow, etc.) are more pedestrian and would have the same connotation as calling someone "buddy" or "guy".
- Sometimes when a color is on the border of two main colors, it's a name for both of them (Ex. Cyana is a common name in both Maradosa and Covalt).
- Surnames are different; they are based on a profession or a trait well-known to their lineage. They typically have a color reflected in them in some way. For example, a family of Flav farmers might have the surname Honeymeadow or Buffields.